

Before the Indiana Telephone Privacy law, I would receive 2-3 calls per night with someone trying to sell some service or item that was unsolicited. These calls would come during times when I was trying to spend time with my family. Sometimes, I would receive calls late in the evening when my children were asleep. This was very annoying.

With the Telephone Privacy law, the calls have reduced from approximately 10-15 per week, to less the 2 per week. This is awesome law.

I feel my time is very valuable. I do not want to waste it talking with someone that has not even done enough research on me to determine if I need their product or service.

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

I would think the FCC would have more important issues to concern themselves with than this. Maybe more time should be spent on ways to clean up the trash on some television programs. I find it hard to let my children watch TV.
